

Editor's Notes

This special issue would not have been possible without the help of many scholars. First of all, I owe a special debt to each of the contributors to this project, not only for accepting the invitation, but also because of their great interest in the relevance of Husserl's phenomenology of transcendental constituting consciousness for future phenomenological thought. I am extremely grateful to all of the authors not only for agreeing to participate, but also for accommodating themselves to the tight schedule the project required. It is by virtue of the singular merits of each of these articles that we are able to offer in this special issue a contribution to the larger task of questioning the transcendental character of phenomenology. I would also like to thank Prof. Dr. Ilie Pârnu, without whom I hardly would have ever initiated this project. A special word of thanks goes to George Bondor and Corneliu Bilbă for their patience and high professionalism in carrying the project forward at Meta: Research in Hermeneutics, Phenomenology, and Practical Philosophy.
